We felt sure something would "bust" when we first saw fashion plates of the 1916 model bathing suits. Now it appears that there has been a mother's meeting of the Atlantic coast sharks, at which it was decided to suppress these abbreviated costumes, which move according to the news dispatches, is proving very successful.

SUING SUE

By LESLIE SOMERS.

She ran down to the end of the lane when she caught sight of the little white mail cart coming up the hill. The March air was fresh and keen, with a hint of spring.

"Got a letter from New York state for you, Sue," said the old mail carrier, comfortably.

Sue colored a little and laughed. He jogged on along the country road, and Sue sat on the stone wall beside the mail box to read her letter. It was an answer to her advertisement.

"Dear Madam: 'While I have not had years of experience in farm work, I should like to apply for the position you offer. All kinds of horses and all animals, was brought up on a farm and can manage one the size of yours. I am sure, with profit to yourself. Am twenty-seven, unmarried, and so anxious to shake the dust of the city off my heels and hit green fields again."

July 21-Aug. 18

Mr. and Mrs. John Waldrop left last Wednesday morning for their old home place at Weatherford, Texas, after a stay of about seven months here for the benefit of Mr. Waldrop's health. The change here to this altitude did not seem to be of benefit, and they returned to the lower altitude. Their little two months old baby died a few minutes after their arrival at Weatherford.

that I'd walk from here to lay if you say the word.

"Hopefully yours,

"BART WILLIS."

"I think you're taking a fearful risk on your shoulders, Sue," her mother said after she had heard the letter. "You could hire the farm work done."

"I won't do that this year, mother dear. Last spring we tried it, and it was a perfect frost."

Accordingly, Spring Valley had a thrill the end of the week when a tall, determined-looking young man swung off the early boat train with a suitcase and asked the way to the Loomis farm.

Old Mrs. Loomis saw him from the sitting-room window and went out to greet him. As she said later to Sue, she just couldn't help taking to him right away.

"You'll have to suit Sue more than me," said Mrs. Loomis. "I'm sure I like the look of you real well." Suing Sue was a curious occupation, Bart found out. She liked him at first sight, the same as her mother had, but she had no intention of letting him know the fact.

The first day of his arrival she led him all over the forty-seven acres. He found that day by day she was beside him when he least expected to see her, advising, correcting and consulting with him.

"You see, I love the land and I want to build it up," she told him. "Father just took and took from it year after year and wondered why it didn't bear for him, but I'm running it differently. I never liked the house, though. It's so bare and lonesome looking."

"Perhaps toward fall there'll be time to do something with it," Bart said. "You can do wonders with cement and paint and ideas."

"But—" Sue hesitated. "I thought—you only said you'd stay until the summer's work was done."

"I like it here," the city boy answered briefly, lifting his head to the sun and air and beauty of it all like the horses, Bess and Ready, out in the pasture. "I'll stay as long as I suit you, Miss Loomis."

Under his care the old farm seemed to put forth its very best efforts to make good. There had never been such a garden crop, even Mrs. Loomis said.

"Don't it seem good to have a man around?" Mrs. Loomis said to her one early morning as Sue cooked breakfast. "It'll be right lonesome when he's gone."

Her own heart echoed the words, but Sue laughed. Wasn't she the man around the place? They wouldn't need any assistant manager after the crops were harvested and fall had come.

She hurried out of doors and down the lane with food for the turkeys, and met him half way with the milk pails.

"The land glows this morning, doesn't it?" he called to her happily. "I was slow because I went over to look at the lower meadows. Wish you'd forget about your hay down there next year and give me those lush fields for prize cattle. I'd start with six and buy more land as we needed it. Don't you want to take on a partner, Sue?"

He spoke her name unthinkingly, quite as if he were accustomed to it, and Sue was silent, looking away from him at the stretch of home acres.

"It's such a bully little place if it's treated right. I've been planning some new things for next year—"

Sue looked up at him quickly, her eyes full of surprised acknowledgment of what his words meant to her.

"I thought sure you'd go to the dairy farm. They want you and they can pay four times as much as I can down there."

"No, they can't Sue." His voice lowered until it seemed to her the whole world must hold its breath to catch what he was telling her. "I want to go shares on the farm here with you. I've got some money saved, enough to put into the place and stock it up right for us. And I want you, too. I won't take the farm without you."

"Mother's waiting for the milk for her breakfast, and I forgot all about it," she faltered. "Oh, Bart, somebody'll see you from the road."

But Bart never appeared even to remember the road. There was just the lane in its dew-drenched sweetness and the fragrance next to them, and Sue held close in his arms.
